“Regrettfully, I lost touch with Brandon after high school graduation. I’m remembering his incredible laugh and his spot-on impression of Scooby Doo, and in particular two moments I’m grateful to have shared with him. The first one is being the only two students in physics class to volunteer for the tablecloth trick. The adrenaline rush one gets from successfully whipping a tablecloth from underneath a full set of glass dinnerware without disturbing the dishes has to be experienced first-hand. After I did it and told the class how fun it was, Brandon insisted on going next. I’ll never forget his intense, reddened face and the sound that came out of it the second after he had pulled the cloth. It was somewhere between a “Yeah!” and a roar; he had no doubt felt the rush. The second moment is sweet and special and I think of it every time I hear Queen on the radio. I’d invited Brandon and other friends over to my house for a New Year’s party to bring in the new Millenium. I was so excited to have the crew there, even though we all half-expected Y2K to shut the world down. At some point, someone put a Queen cd in the stereo to serve as the background party music. After midnight struck and after screaming “Happy New Year,” all of us went out to my back porch just as We Are the Champions began to play. I remember feeling a lot of love in that moment between all of us; singing and swaying with our arms around each other, the world be damned.
