“ The thing I remember most about Julie was her laugh. She was always laughing. The joy of life resided in her every pore. Her laugh was unique and infectious. No one could ever imitate it, though we all tried. Beyond that wonderful laugh, however, was a toughness and courage that few of us could have guessed was there. The last time I saw Julie, she was in remission from the cancer that would ultimately take her life. Though she had been through the darkness of disease, you would never know it from the way she lived her life. She came to Chicago for a weekend and we all had such a wonderful time. Little did we know that somewhere in her, the dreaded cancer was reforming and girding for another attack. It was when the cancer made itself known again that we saw just how strong and brave Julie was. I was lucky enough to correspond with her by email as she took up the battle anew. I told her that all of us looked to her composure and will to live as guidance and instruction on how to face the worst life can bring. No life is ever lived in vain. But Julie showed that there is a strength that allows us to deal with the bleakest of times. I like to think of the dead as those who have simply gone on ahead. She left too soon, but I am certain that she is in a safe and peaceful place now, looking out for the rest of us, awaiting our arrival. And laughing, always laughing.
